Good evening,

Ottawa Police Service continued enforcement operations today to take back city streets. They did great work with the support of Public Order Units from multiple jurisdictions including Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon and Regina. Police are currently reporting over 170 arrests and at least 53 towed vehicles. Many more vehicles have departed downtown neighborhoods, as well as the Coventry Road encampment, on their own accord. There are no heavy vehicles on Kent Street; the Sir John A MacDonald Parkway is free of vehicles but is not open (significant work is required to make the road safe and to clear debris, which will occur tomorrow morning). While there continues to be several hundred protesters in the downtown core, they are disorganized and no longer have access to the supplies that used to be stored in vehicles and in supply stations in front of Parliament.

Fencing has been put in place and barriers have been moved to help secure the cleared areas. In addition, City staff have been supporting various remediation activities to clear snow piles, remove debris left by protesters, and dispose of any hazardous material (e.g., fuel). As a result of enforcement operations Friday and Saturday, one dog was taken into care by By-Law; however, no children have been placed under the protection of the Children's Aid Society of Ottawa.

The EOC is working with Ottawa Police Service to assess impacts over the next few days. Despite the excellent work led by Ottawa Police Service, the protest movement has not totally dissipated. We expect more progress to be made tomorrow, and for police checkpoints and traffic impacts to slowly lighten, as a result. The EOC is working with a range of partners to forecast on-going service impacts over the next week, as part of this shift to de-mobilization.
